

The media has for decades tried to equate gun ownership with mental instability and painted people who want to have available to them the most effective means of defending themselves against predators (handguns) as just plain nuts, but the truth as we all know is far different. Often the mere presence of a gun can deter a bad guy without a shot having to be fired. Unfortunately in modern America, anyone can sue anybody for anything, and if you carry a gun, you need to protect yourself in a different way--legally.

There are a number of pre-paid legal options available, but all of them by nature are very limited in scope. The NRA offers an insurance policy with their membership, which sounds great until you actually read what it covers--almost nothing. I'm not aware of a policy out there which actually does what CWI does--covers valid CCW holders as they go out in public while legally armed. And coverage doesn't stop the moment you have to pull the trigger.

Going home to your family is the #1 rule in a gunfight. Not losing everything you have financially because you decided to take responsibility for your own safety is a pretty good idea too, which is why I've got a CWI policy.
